The biggest change is in the Organizer, where the changes include a new Book module, which you can define as a set of rules regarding how your images appear in the Organizer. It does this by assigning metadata to each book, and by setting actual rules about how folders are selected to be part of a book and how they appear in the front and the back of the book. The interface for creating books is streamlined, and it borrows greatly from Lightroom's interface. You're given a library of books along with a preview of each one. You can select more than one book and create a book by combining them. A book can have several folders assigned to it, and also have multiple pages in a page. Since Lightroom 4's page design, no one else could have survived that as long as it, because it's detailed and precise — but it's so detailed that it often ends up being infuriating. Not so with pages in a book. The new interface allows you to do almost anything with the pages. You can set which pages appear in the front or back, or when they're the first or last. You can set whether you want to see a page total in the preview or in the Book, and whether the printed page should have the blue or white page border. You can set the size and layout of preview frames. If you decide you want to see Total pages, you can order it alphabetically or by most frequent. You can even set a book's Content area behavior, which is somewhat similar to saving on a Lightroom catalog. This adjusts the behavior of the back and front buttons to better align with a given scenario.
